SBC ban on women pastors fails

Vote may not end debate over issue

INDIANAPOLIS — The Southern Baptist Convention rejected Wednesday a constitutional ban on women pastors, a major victory for those within the nation's largest Protestant denomination seeking to maintain local church autonomy and soften what many considered a growing antagonism toward women in ministry.

The narrow outcome resolved a two-year political dispute about church policy, though it might not subdue the ensuing debate about women's roles in the church. The proposed amendment was by far the most animating issue headed into this year's SBC annual meeting, one that even colored other decision-making – including the election for SBC president.

If the measure passed, more churches were expected to voluntarily leave the Nashville-based denomination. For some, it would be due to a message downplaying women's contributions to the church, while others saw the SBC becoming overbearing about certain doctrinal beliefs.

Growing up in Albania, he never saw a bagel. Never even heard of a bagel. • Niko Bendaj ate his first one when he moved to New York at age 21 – and he was unimpressed. • It's just bread, he thought. • "I couldn't have cared less." •

About 13 years later, Bendaj and his wife, Becca, own and run Nashville's newest bagel shop, Benji's Bagel & Coffee House in West Nashville, where customers often wait 30 minutes or longer to place orders on weekends.

Founder, first headliner reflect on first Bonnaroo

Before Bonnaroo became Bonnaroo, it was just a couple of guys standing in an open Tennessee field with a crazy idea.

Now, more than 20 years later, one of Tennessee's biggest music festivals is still going strong, attracting 80,000 festivalgoers each year for four days of music and arts in Manchester.

This year's Bonnaroo is among us again, taking place on June 13-16 with headliners Post Malone, Pretty Lights, Red Hot Chili Peppers and Fred Again.

To commemorate another year of Bonnaroo joy, The Tennessean spoke with Bonnaroo's founder, Ashley Capps and the headlining band for the festival's first two years, the rock band Widespread Panic.
